Carrie Plumbo had not been back to the mountain camp that she remembered from her girlhood in 50 years

That's why it was such a special occasion when the Lower Burrell resident and her cousins returned for a day recently to see their old swimming hole and camp to re-live old times

'It was so exciting. It inspired so many memories. I couldn't wait to paint it," she says.

The result is "Three Pines," a watercolor that she has entered in the East Suburban Artists League's annual show under way at Penn State New Kensington Art Gallery

Each of the artists in the monthlong show has stories behind the work they have hung.

Gloria Hersch of Murrysville was in a philosophical mood about the dawn of a new century last year when she took on her acrylic paint-ing "The Dawn of Y2K." "I created the scene of a bird overlooking the dawn coming up, the birth of a new century. I wondered, What will this century be like?' "When her muse turned that bird into a predator, she wondered whether that was an omen about the millennium.

Intrigued by sunrises, Virginia Carey of North Apollo, a retired biology teacher, offers the watercolor "Sunrise.

"I just paint for my own benefit. I enjoy it. It's relaxing and stretches my limits," she says.

She likes the challenge of watercolors. "It's not like oils. You can't go over it again," she explains.

Lawyer Bob Bickers of Murrysville has a deep interest in American Indian art. One of his oils in the show is "Bushy Run Lunch Break," his painting of an Indian re-enactor at Bushy Run stopping to eat lunch.

His love of the outdoors is seen in "Autumn Afternoon," an oil of a stream in Cook Forest with the autumn leaves backlit

"It's a very exciting show to look at because of the variety," says Bud Gibbons, gallery director and art instructor. "Each artist has a different style." The works range from stained-glass through oil to watercolor. The subject matter ranges from landscape to still life.

Such showcases remind people of the talent in the area, says artist Sue

Foster of Export, show chairman. She teaches adult education watercolor and drawing classes at Franklin Regional School

"There is a lot of talent," says Mort Hersch

Lawyer Bickers finds art a way to relax. "I like the freedom of being able to express feelings of putting something down that is permanent that you always can look back at," he says. "It's a statement that, 'This is vours and vours alone.

He has been involved with art since childhood. "I sold drawings of race cars and space craft to my fellow classmates for a nickel a piece," he recalls laughing.
Bickers still does commission work but says his rates have gone up. "It's more than a nickel at this point," he says.
